ARTS COUNCIL ENGLAND

'Creativity is not bound within the arts, but a wider ability to question, make connections and take an innovative and imaginative approach to problem solving.'

What is Creative Partnerships

Creative Partnerships is the government's flagship creative learning programme, designed to develop the skills of children and young people across England, raising their aspirations, achievements, skills and life chances. This world-leading programme is transforming teaching and learning across the curriculum.

What we do

We support thousands of innovative, long-term partnerships between schools and creative professionals, including artists, performers, architects, multimedia developers and scientists.

Young people develop the skills they need to fulfil their potential, not only in exams and extra-curricular activities, but also in the workplace and wider society.

Teachers are also able to nurture their creativity, develop their practice and become better educators.

Working with Creative Partnerships, schools use creativity to solve problems and see real improvements in pupil behaviour and school performance.

What we believe

We believe that creativity is not a skill bound within the arts, but a wider ability to question, make connections, and take an innovative and imaginative approach to problem solving. These are skills that are demanded by today's employers.

What we have achieved

- Schools that work with Creative Partnerships improve their GCSE results faster
- Absence rates have been reduced by a fifth in Creative Partnerships primary schools
- Academic evidence shows that Creative Partnerships increases parental engagement in children's learning

Where we work

We have worked with over 2,700 schools in areas of deprivation across England, with children of all ages.

One of a number of programmes generated by the new national organisation Creativity, Culture and Education, the Creative Partnerships programme is delivered through a range of different local organisations across England.
